

The author presents a comparative analysis of recent trends in quality assessment systems for higher education. In Europe (and in Portugal) there is a recent lack of trust in institutions resulting from blame policies linked to the emergence of new public management in the public sector. This has resulted in the increasing popularity of systems of accreditation that give more emphasis to accountability instead of quality improvement.